Whether or not that conversation will ever affect the way we live on a daily basis is a fair question. But I think the answer is yes. When I speak to people who are interested in the intersection between business and technology, often it is happening in the context of sustainability — think about the fact that more and more consumers are demanding renewable energy; or that the rise of urbanization means that cities are becoming more livable places for people to live. The nature of the human enterprise is to impact the environment, and we are just beginning to understand the consequences of that on business models and how to create resilience within our business models.

On a more personal level, I think we are also grappling with the new normal in which we are bringing our smart devices into our homes and working spaces. I've always said that if you do not stop using your iPhone every four hours to charge it, it should not have been a purchase. I've seen people trade in their phones for new ones every month, because it took three hours to charge, and the new ones were lighter. They have become so integrated

The lawyer is ultimately responsible for the outcome of your case, and hiring the wrong lawyer can be a waste of your time and money. Therefore, it is imperative that you thoroughly research potential lawyers and their qualifications before selecting one. In this article, we address three key areas to consider when looking for a lawyer. Educational Requirements For attorneys to be admitted to practice law in the United States, attorneys must have graduated from an accredited law school, passed the California Bar Exam, and demonstrate commitment to a career in law by working in the legal field prior to becoming an attorney. The bar exam requires you to demonstrate the ability to interpret and apply the law. The legal practice field requires you to demonstrate the ability to respond to often-complex legal issues, with a special emphasis on the law and the courtroom environment. Thus, prospective attorneys should have undergraduate and graduate-level degrees in law or law-related field, such as business, economics, political science, history, or public administration, as well as five years of experience in a legal field. Experience Prospective lawyers should have

For example, a criminal law attorney may be more experienced with representing criminal defendants than civil plaintiffs. Experience is especially important when dealing with recent, high-profile incidents or a trial that has been pending for an extended period of time.

Legal Research A lawyer's level of legal research skills is of utmost importance. Legal research involves thorough study and analysis of the law and legal cases. Skills such as evaluating legal precedent, developing legal briefs, and drafting and analyzing legal contracts are all important components of legal research. A prospective attorney's level of legal research can be determined by examining the lawyer's experience and educational background. When the lawyer has many years
