The Green Party have put forward a list of candidates who they think will be able to take on powerful parties within the UK's ruling Conservative and Labour parties and beat them in the UK's upcoming general election. The Green Party have put forward a list of candidates who they think will be able to take on powerful parties within the UK's ruling Conservative and Labour parties and beat them in the UK's upcoming general election. The list features 51 candidates who they believe could stand a real chance of making a difference in the election. Each of the candidates has been hand-picked by the Green Party and you can view a copy of the list of candidates here. The candidates have been put forward based on their policies.

The vote will have a similar result to those used to select the candidates who finished in first place in the London Assembly elections last year. All elected Green Party members will have the same right to vote as Green Party members in the election. Stuart Agnew, Green London Assembly member and the party's candidate for the general election said: "The Green Party is an anti-austerity party, we want to see the government step back from the destructive effects of austerity and instead put forward an alternative. "We want to see a new economic model, one based on a new economy, where we invest in our schools, hospitals and childcare, creating thousands of decent jobs for working people and end the destructive race to the bottom of the labour market. "The Green Party wants to see a fairer society, one where we tackle the waste of £28bn of public money being spent on prisons and of the £900m of public money being spent on CCTV that is used to spy on the British public. "We also want to see a future of housing, where we take a council house for a council tenant and open access to rented accommodation so that everyone can get a home of their own. "We also want to see land and housing where people and nature is valued and protecting the environment is not a dirty word but becomes a part of everyday life."
