To review the literature to evaluate whether the decline of myopia in East and West will be different. A systematic review of the English-language literature was conducted using MEDLINE and EMBASE searches with the terms 'myopia' or 'near-sightedness' in combination with 'East' or 'Asia' or 'Africa' or 'Southeast Asia' or 'Europe' or 'South America'. In addition, searches were conducted to include additional papers on myopia that were identified in the bibliographies of the studies identified. All relevant studies were selected for full text review. The impact of a number of factors on myopia prevalence was evaluated, including ethnicity, age, gender and education. A total of 37 studies were identified. East Asian populations showed a slower decline in myopia than their counterparts in the West. This observation was related to both an overall slower decline in the East Asian population and a shift of the distribution of the refractive error to more highly myopic refractive states. A number of other factors were observed to be associated with a decline in myopia, including age, gender and education. Myopia in the East and West will decline at different rates, which should facilitate future comparison of the causes of myopia in these two regions of the world.
