Eobd facile version complete keygen 39Combine orchidopexy and testicular hematoma repair in boys with distal penoscrotal transverse constriction: long-term follow-up. Distal penoscrotal transverse constriction is one of the most common forms of hypospadias and is characterized by fusion of the scrotum with the penis. We reviewed our results with orchidopexy and testicular hematoma repair in boys with distal penoscrotal transverse constriction. We conducted a retrospective chart review of all boys with distal penoscrotal transverse constriction treated with orchidopexy, tunica vaginalis approximation, and testicular hematoma repair between 1990 and 2004. A total of 33 consecutive boys (mean age, 1 year 7 months) were treated with orchidopexy alone (n = 16), orchidopexy and testicular hematoma repair (n = 16), and orchidopexy with testicular hematoma repair followed by delayed ventral scrotoplasty (n = 1). Mean follow-up was 7 years (range: 3-21 years). There was no urethral diverticulum in 12 boys (36%). Of the 33 boys, 4 (12%) required a second surgical procedure to repair the penile chordee. Other complications included 5 (15%) urinary fistulas (2 of which were treated with surgical correction), 2 (6%) urethrocutaneous fistulas, 2 (6%) cases of enuresis, and 1 (3%) urinary tract infection. The patients were dry. There was 1 (3%) recurrent distal penoscrotal transverse constriction. The overall success rate of the combined procedures was 72% (24 of 33) with the lowest in those patients treated with orchidopexy alone (37%). When used in conjunction with orchidopexy, testicular hematoma repair is an effective treatment option in boys with distal penoscrotal transverse constriction.
