continued “Twenty kilometres a day,” said the source, who is a well-known figure in the city’s cycling community.
“Sometimes you can’t ride and sometimes you don’t want to — (referring to all-day training rides) — but I just keep at it.
It’s what works.” Pre-planning and marking routes for cyclists and pedestrians also requires a lot of energy. “We need to provide detailed maps and route strategies so that people can ride on streets that suit them,” said Schwimmer. Pedestrian and cyclist traffic will flow seamlessly thanks to new right-of-way over existing transit. (Green space will be prioritized, but space for such access is not easy to come by in the dense urban core.) The downtown's "broken street" problem will be fixed, with vehicle access points moved out of sight by the gradual conversion of the street to a buffered cycle track. Boulevard riders, still confined to the sidewalks and making use of the existing transit corridors, will be able to hop on a bikeway to reach the TTC. And those living in the suburbs will be able to ride through the downtown or farther afield on a network of bike lanes. "We know where to go with our bike lanes," said Schwimmer. "This is a critical part of the build." Bylaw changes are on the way, too. This summer, the city is expected to finalize a bylaw requiring cyclists to obey the same rules as motor vehicles, which means giving the right of way to pedestrians. "We would be creating a bike lane if we had to," said Schwimmer. "We would be creating a bike lane if we had to." Traffic calming in the form
