A newborn baby, still inside the womb, was born with a 6-inch long appendix -- the longest ever found in a live birth. The mid-section appendage was discovered at a private clinic in the southern Brazil city of Manaus along with the baby's other organs. The baby's appendix was 6 inches long, and the rest of its organs were functioning normally, the doctors reported. The 18-inch-long body part is half as long as an adult or other large animals' appendix. Normal appendices are 1 to 3 inches long. Doctors and the mother said there is no reason to question the size of the baby's appendix, according to a report published Thursday in the scientific journal, Pediatric Research. "It is just the appendix of an adolescent in the body of a newborn baby," study author Dr. Igor Rojas, a pediatrician at the Federal University of Santa Catarina, told CNN. "A baby built by a mother, and it wasn't the biggest baby that I've seen in my career. The biggest ones I have seen were about two months, three months or a year old." The baby's father is a seven-year-old boy whose appendix was removed in infancy because of a condition called appendicitis, an American Journal report said. The baby's condition, called megacolon, is caused by a hormone imbalance, stemming from genetic factors in the mother or father, but it is unclear whether the mother's appendix was enlarged as a result.
