Chronic myeloid leukemia (CML) has been considered a clonal malignant disorder involving the Philadelphia chromosome. However, there are cases of CML patients in whom cytogenetic abnormalities other than the t(9;22) or BCR-ABL fusion gene have been detected, suggesting the existence of other genetic abnormalities. A survey was conducted to identify such defects in CML patients. We performed fluorescence in situ hybridization on metaphase chromosomes of seven cytogenetically normal CML patients to investigate the characteristics of chromosomal aberrations. The frequencies of fragile sites were determined in these cells using the inverted-repeat DNA method. A very high frequency of CML cells with chromosomal aberrations was observed c6a93da74d
